THE EXHIBITION.—Our visitors to meet the wishes of the travelling community, has now the pleasure of informing his friends, that he has added about fifty new and airy rooms to his Hotel, which he trusts will enable him to accommodate all who may patronize his house. From the encouragement he experiences from a determination to meet the guests as far as desired, and from a desire to afford himself that old friends will continue, and new ones be induced to give him a trial. His near proximity to the Railroad Depot, and the several Steamboats on the large, airy and well ventilated apartments, and healthy location, make it a desirable place for Southern as well as Northern Travellers. Respectfully,
JOSEPH JEWETT, Proprietor.

Will anyone say that Joseph Howard was "unequivocally, unadulterably, or a political lawbreaker?" Not at all. His political opinions cannot fail to be pure, estimable, and they will bear witness to his fidelity to his country as well as to his character, both in public and private life, and yet the man who deliberately declared, by a resolution upon this floor, that such a removal was "against the interests of the people, the rights of the States, and the spirit of the Constitution," at this moment occupies his place. But, Sir, proposing as I do to group together the representatives of this consistent, patriotic party as they are presenting in their resolutions and speeches, I must not indulge in remarks which will suggest themselves to every reflecting mind.

In January, 1823, Mr. Ewing, the present occupant of the Secretary of the Treasury, submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the practice of removing public officers by the President is any other practice than that of securing a faithful execution of the laws, is hostile to the spirit of the Constitution, was never contemplated by the framers of the Constitution, and is equally prejudicial to the public service, and dangerous to the liberties of the people.

Such a resolution would be inopportune for the Senate to assent to the appointment of any person to fill a supposed vacancy in any office occasioned by the removal of a prior incumbent, unless such person in precedent shall appear to have been removed for dishonest causes.

The principles thus advanced were fully sustained by the mover, and most of the prominent members of his own party, in speeches, by which, I believe, in opposition to the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, the distinguished Senator from Kentucky introduced the following, with a series of resolutions upon the same subject:

Resolved, That the Constitution of the United States does not invest the President with power to remove, at his pleasure, officers under the government of the U. States, whose offices have been established by law."

The honorable Senator, in supporting his resolution, said, "they presented subjects of grave inquiry and deep import, involving the purity of the Administration, and the very veridicality of the Government."

The three first resolutions assumed that the Constitution gave no power of removal from office by the President of the U. S., at his pleasure.

And again: "This offending army was dangerous in time of peace, and in time of war."

That is, such an army as, being distinguished by their dress from the rest of the community, was capable of being seen and estimated. But how different from this was this army of forty thousand men, dispersed over the whole country, and obeying one common impulse, ready to rally around and carry into effect the purposes and objects of the Government, and how much more dangerous than that army against which the fears of the people have been directed. And the time would come when, if it was not soon checked, it would as certainly decide the succession to the Presidential chair, as the Prætorian band of ancient Rome decided on the disposition of emperors and kings. He hoped gentlemen should turn their attention to the subject, and not merely to examine the Constitution carefully, and not stretch themselves behind one solitary precedent."

In the same year President Tyler said: "I have argued these questions (of Executive power) without reference to the power of removal."

And again: "The President of the United States has that power greater power than any monarch has anywhere."

I find, No. 47 of the Federalist, p. 437, Alexander Hamilton reasoning upon it as an admitted fact.
